BABY SAFETY MONTH

Baby Safety Month was introduced by the Juvenile Products Manufacturers Association (JPMA) in 1983 with "Expectant Mother's Day." In 1986, the day was increased to a week of celebration of baby safety. In 1988, the official spokeswoman for the week was actress Jayne Kennedy. Some things to do at home to keep your baby safe!

1. Soft Snacks Only- Harder foods present a choking hazard for babies - make sure their food is soft and easy to swallow.
2. Medicine Isn't a Spoonful of Sugar -Beware of teaching children that medicine is candy, as this could lead to them taking your medicine when you aren't around.
3. Don't Toss the Baby- Shaking a baby or tossing him in the air can cause blindness or brain damage.
4. Watch for Broken Toys- Even very baby-safe toys can present a hazard if broken. Be on the lookout for any of your child's toys that have been damaged or come apart - make sure all pieces/toys are larger than the child's mouth.
5. Baby Gates Everywhere! - Baby gates can be heavily employed to keep babies away from the many things that pose hazards to them - drawers with sharp objects, rooms with open electrical sockets, pools, and more.

Teacher presentations

Teachers may give presentations on the curriculum, classroom policies and procedures, and class values and expectations. Some teachers may also teach a mini lesson to show parents how they approach the curriculum.

Classroom visits

Parents may be able to visit their child's classroom to hear from their teacher. This can help families with multiple children or parents who want to meet with other teachers.

Interactive activities

Some schools may include interactive activities that allow families to learn together.
